ADVENTUREX

Trekking & Camping Website

WEB DEVELOPMENT PROJECT REPORT

Technologies: HTML5 and CSS3 | Project type: Responsive static website

Source: Complete original HTML and CSS supplied for this report. No JavaScript is present in the source.

1. Introduction

AdventureX is an educational trekking and camping website that introduces outdoor activities, trekking routes, campsite options, trip preparation, safety guidelines and example packages. The design uses a forest-green and golden-yellow palette to create an adventurous, nature-focused experience.

2. Project Objectives

The main objectives are to present trekking destinations clearly, describe camping experiences, display sample pricing and trip schedules, educate visitors about essential equipment and safe outdoor practices, and create a layout that adapts to desktop and mobile screens.

3. Technologies Used

HTML5: Provides the semantic page structure, including header, navigation, sections, articles, headings, lists, images, links and footer. CSS3: Controls the colors, typography, spacing, responsive grids, hover effects, cards, image overlays and media queries. No JavaScript is used.

4. Website Features

Navigation and hero banner: A sticky top navigation bar links to the major page sections. The full-width hero introduces the website with a mountain background, headline and action links.

Adventure statistics: Four counters present sample figures for adventure routes, camping locations, difficulty levels and adventure spirit.

Trekking routes: Six illustrated trek cards show destinations, difficulty tags, duration, descriptions and example starting prices.

Camping experiences: Mountain Camping and Forest Camping cards list sample activities, inclusions and prices.

Trip schedule: A three-day sample itinerary describes arrival, trekking activities and departure.

Equipment checklist: Four groups cover essentials, clothing, camping gear, and health and safety items.

Safety guidelines: Preparation tips, on-trail advice and an important warning remind visitors to follow official guidance.

Adventure packages: Three sample plans—Day Explorer, Camping Escape and Mountain Explorer—show example inclusions and prices.

Gallery and footer: A photo gallery, call-to-action section, and footer links complete the experience.

5. HTML Structure

The document begins with the HTML5 doctype and metadata for character encoding and responsive viewport behavior. A style block in the head contains the CSS. The body organizes content into the header, hero, statistics, multiple topic sections, a call to action and footer. Internal anchor links connect the menu and action buttons to section IDs.

6. CSS Design and Responsiveness

CSS Grid is used for trekking cards, camping layouts, schedule cards, equipment lists, packages and the gallery. Flexbox arranges the navigation and several details within cards. Rounded corners, shadows, transitions and background overlays improve readability. Media queries at 1000px and 700px reorganize multi-column layouts for narrower screens.

7. Development Process

The project can be developed by planning page sections, writing semantic HTML, adding the stylesheet, inserting sample content and image references, checking anchor navigation, and testing layout at different viewport widths. The supplied file can be saved with an .html extension and opened directly in a web browser.

8. Advantages

The website is simple to deploy, has a consistent visual identity, provides useful educational information, works without a backend, and includes responsive layouts. Clear content sections and internal links make it easy for visitors to browse.

9. Limitations

The website is a static demonstration: it does not provide live availability, payments, account management or a working booking form. Prices and packages are examples, not verified offers. External Unsplash images require network access to load. Trail conditions and safety requirements must be checked through official sources before a real trip.

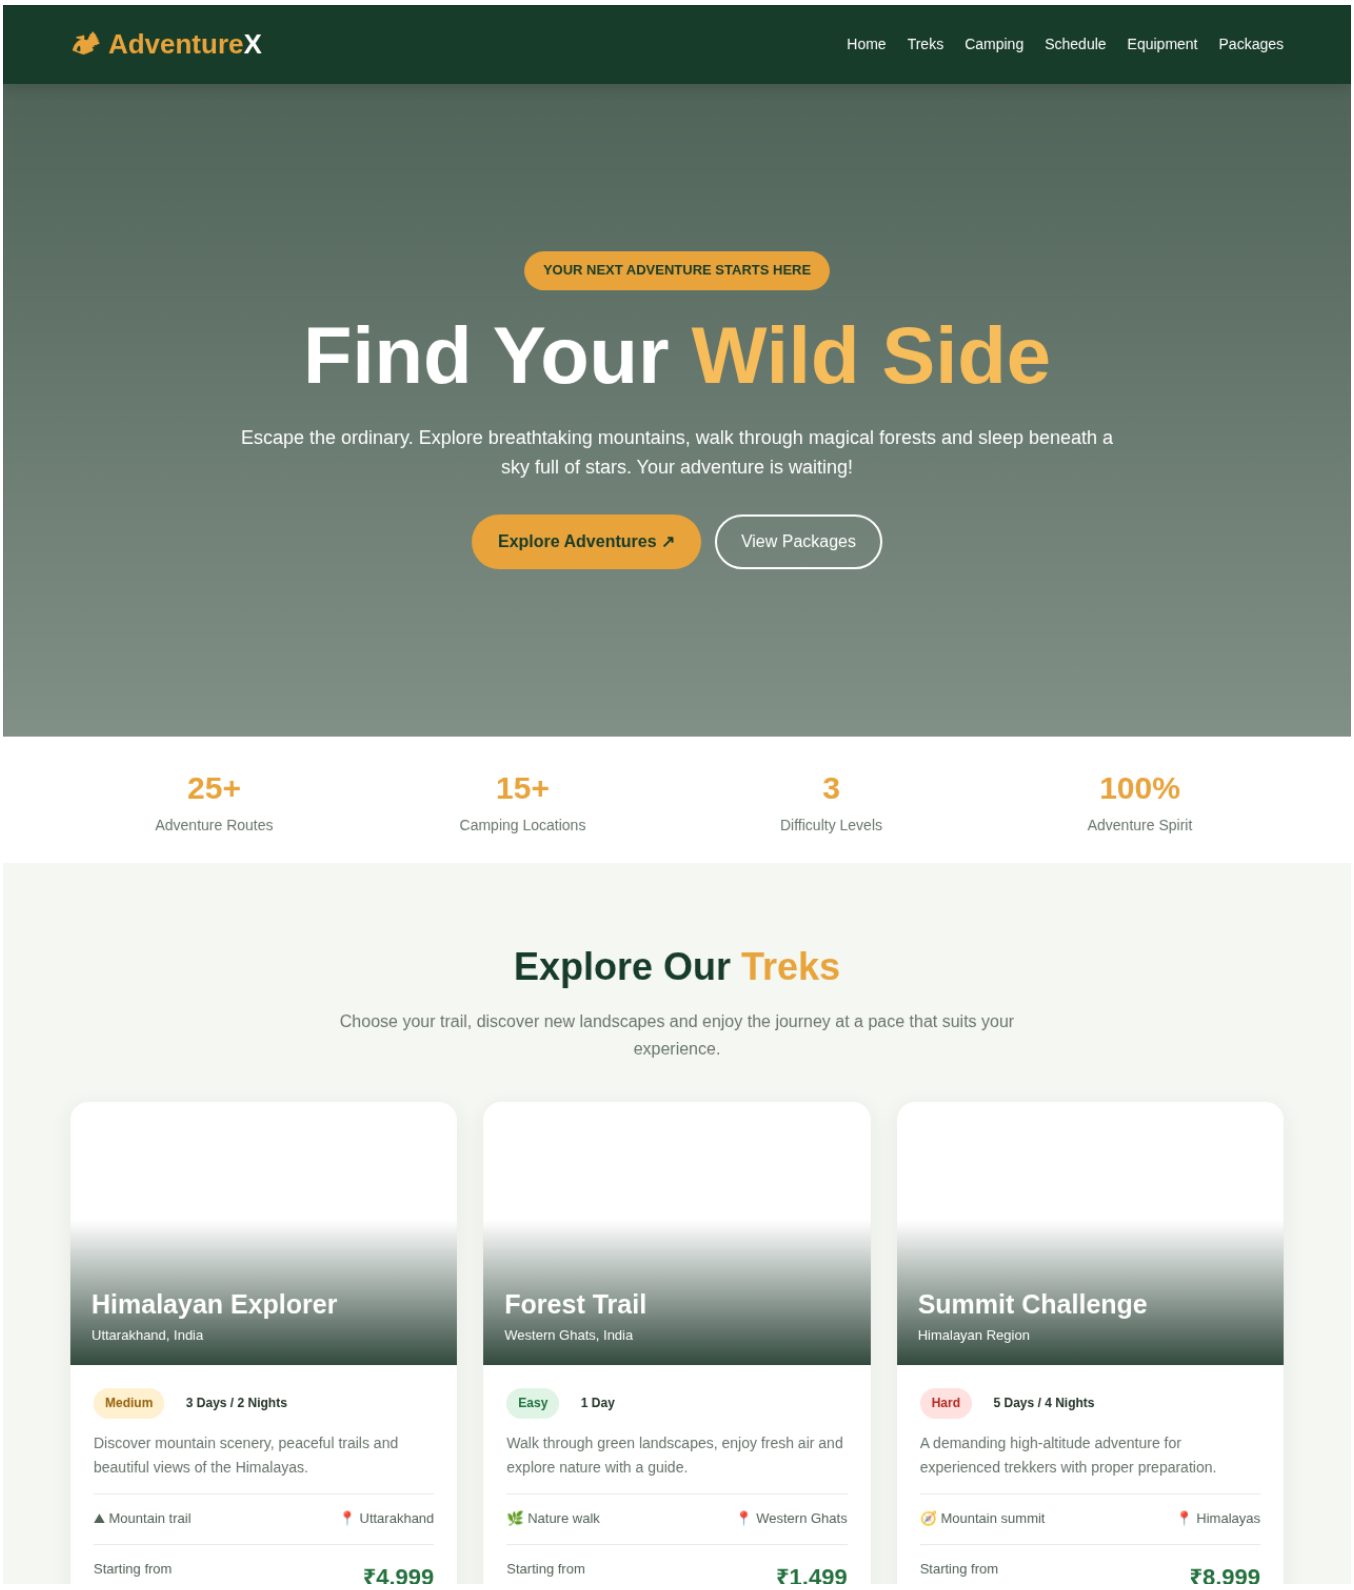

10. Conclusion

AdventureX demonstrates how HTML and CSS can be combined to create an attractive, responsive adventure-tourism website. It organizes trekking, camping, trip planning and safety information into a clear interface and provides a foundation for a future fully functional booking platform.
